he Great Esthetic Craze Opera Preented Before a Large and Brilliant Audience Last Night.

t Makes a Palpable Hit, Being Enthusiastically Applauded to the Echo by the Audience.

In Patience, Gilbert has fairly outdone himself. The mine of humor lying in asthetic-ism would never have been suspected had it not been for the polished keenness of Gil not been for the poissed keenless of Offi-bert's mind. He gave it a local habitation, a permanent embodiment, and though it has been laughed at, succeed at and scoffed at, it has had its effect on the fashions of the time at least. Furthermore, it has furnished many a hearty laugh for those whose minds are attuned to the humorous nature of things. The ordinary man will admit a mild degree of the resuissance into his everyday life, whereas he will raise his honest arm against professional estheticism, which is but another name for paying ssininity. Nothing so laughably, so innocently absurd as the Gilbertian concep-tion and satire of Oscar Wildeism has been perpetrated for many a day. He makes it ranscendentalism over commonplace, and ne invests his subject with the keenest and no less well than Gilbert. How delicately has he in music portrayed the gentle miscoic of the twenty lovesick maidens. The music is of a dreamy, ecstatic style, and accordingly consorts well with the dainty trifles and odd conocits of Gilbert. It is dreamily languorous, and perceptibly asthetic; but at the same time it is delicate, plays tricks upon one's ear, and goes off a-waltzing with one's fancy. It is like Pinnfore, and Pirutes in that it has that tunefulness that characterizes everything Sullivan writes; and yet it is entirely distinct. Pinnfore is full of breezy airs that make one feel as if he were at sea, Pirutes is of rather a martial nature, and is replete with stirring airs. Patience, on the eplete with stirring airs. Patience, on the outrary, is like a love-poem musically, and sems to be consecrated to the tender passion. At the very time when the curtain went up, the beautiful orchestration and the harmonic touch of Sullivan were at once perceived.

The music had a tone of lassitude as the young ladies, dressed in esthetic costumes and thrumming away on lutes and mando-lins, were discovered upon the stage singing

Lovesick all against our will; Twenty years hence we shall be Twenty lovesick maidens still They are all, O, perverse fate, in love with a fleshy poet called "Rezinald Bunthorne," and they all droop wittedly about him and follow him yearningly wherever he goes. He, however, though he lives on admiration and is very much gratified at their passion, or rather their absence of passion, loves "Patience," the pretty milkmaid, who does not know what love is. They are "all rivals in the affections of their "Reginald," the very hopelessness of their love being the bond that binds them to each other." "Patience" is not an æsthete, and is, accordingly, not at all bilious. In her simplicity she asks "Lady Angela" the ingennous question, "What is this love that upsets everybody, and how is it to be distinguished from insanity?" "Poor, blind child!" says "Angela, "Why, love is of all passions the most essential! It is the embodiment of purity, the abstraction of rebodiment of purity, the abstraction of re-finement; it is the one unselfish emotion in the whirlpool of grasping greed?" At this

Her singing of the ballad, "Love is a Plaintive Song," was exquisitely tender and sympathetic. There is probably no singer on the American stage who can equal her in the purity of her softer notes, which can be likened to nothing more fittingly than the diminuendo upon a violin.
